

After long and successful litigation, the New-York Filter Manufacturing Company has compelled the O. H. Jewell Filter Company, of Chicago, to take out licenses under the Hyatt patent. An amicable arrangement has been made by which the former corporation confines its operations to Eastern territory, and the latter to a part of the West. The Morrison Filter Company retires from business, and its head becomes a vice-president in the New-York company. Meantime the Loomis-Manning filter, of Philadelphia, has been found guilty of infringing the Hyatt patents, at least in so far as alum is used in their products.
